

- Oh, and speaking of the Gray Lady, yesterday, we mentioned a Times story about how New Jersey State Police had basically given up on traffic enforcement, but failed to stress why that's such a big deal: As enforcement plummeted, crashes on the state's main highways increased by 27 percent quickly ... and then kept rising for six of the next seven months.

Charles Komanoff
@Komanoff · Follow

Maybe dozens of NJ motorists like beloved farmstand owner Giuseppe Zuccarello wd be alive today if @NJGov Murphy & @repjoshg had tended to state troopers' "unrivaled" traffic-safety slowdown instead of grandstanding against NY #congestionpricing: nytimes.com/2024/12/08/nyr...

In July 2023, New Jersey state troopers who patrol the state's busiest highways and remote rural roads suddenly began writing far fewer traffic enforcement tickets. The next month, citations for speeding, drunken driving, cellphone use and other violations plummeted by 81 percent across the state compared with the year before.

The sweeping slowdown in enforcement continued for more than eight months and coincided with an almost immediate uptick in motor vehicle crashes, records obtained by The New York Times show.

The duration and scope of the slowdown are unrivaled in modern policing, according to academics who study traffic data and law enforcement tactics in the United States. The reduction in traffic

1:30 PM · Dec 9, 2024

1 Reply Copy link